Thereafter, the gladiator contests formerly restricted to private remuneration were often included in the state games (ludi) that accompanied an important religious festival; the arena was a public place. The origin and history of the handicap as a social policy is an important concept in Japanese culture and society. In summary, a policy that aims to promote equality and social justice, allowing people with disabilities access to financial resources available outside the country's origins. The handicap as a social policy has its roots in Confucianism, which emphasizes the importance of life, social and moral work. In Japan, a policy of handicap as a social policy was implemented in the Meiji Restoration (1603-1868), when an important person considered competence and abilities. The handicap as a social policy is based on four principles: ability, age, sex and physical condition. The Australian Open is one of the four Grand Slam tournaments. It was first held in 1905 and since then has attracted some of the best tennis players in the world, the tournament lasts two weeks - generally commencing on a Sunday in January and ending with a final normally two months later. The Australian Open is held in four different venues in Melbourne Park, all of which are connected by walkways. These venues include the Rod Laver Arena, the Hisense Arena and the Sydney Olympic Stadium. The Ron Laver arena was the main venue for the tournament which has a capacity for around 15,000 spectators. The Australian Tennis Centre is a modern and durable blue - this makes it a popular venue but ideal for aggressive players. The tournament has five categories of competition: men's singles and women's singles, men's doubles and women's doubles. Each discipline has the highest ranking player receiving a bye for the first round.
